INTRODUCTION

Construction is one of the dangerous occupations in India, causing injuries, diseases and fatalities. Today, health, safety and environment is an integral part of any industry, whether manufacturing or construction industry. It is important that safety, health and environment systems be designed, incorporated and employees trained adequately, checks and counterchecks made to ensure implementation. Health, safety and environment are interrelated and affect each other. If an employee health is not given due regards, it may lead to accident. If the environment around workplace is polluted by an industry, this will affect the health of the employee and in turn affect production. Health, safety and environment is important for sustainable development in modern societies especially in work places where accidents and hazards occur more frequently. The adaptation of health, safety and environmental practices demonstrates the readiness of an industry to minimize the frequency and severity of work related accidents, damage to property and environment.
